JOSEF HOFMANN'S RECITAL

THE YOUNG PIANIST NOW GREAT PLAYER.

He Holds a Great Audience at Carnegie Hall, Playing Beetheven, Chepin and Schumann With High Intelligence and Feeling—Chopin Protudes All in a Row.

Josef Hofmann has arrived. This must be read in two senses. He gave his first recital of the current season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and that naturally proved that he had come to town. But he has arrived in the bigger meaning of the word, for he has grown into the maturity of his indisputable genius for the piano. His recital of yesterday was the triumphant disclosure of a splendid and unique mastery. Mr. Hofmann, who made his debut here as a juvenile prodigy on November 39. 1887, is now an adult artist, a virtuoso of astonishing powers, a planist of profound insight into the nature and capacity of his instrument, a musician of the keenest sensibility to everything that constitutes the exterior enchantment of music and an interpreter equipped with intelligence, feeling and scholarship.

It is only two years since Mr. Hofmann was last in this city, and it was not possible then to express such admiration of his art. But the ripening of his musical experience has been swift and lovely. He has rid himself of almost every vestige of mannerism in touch, which was formerly one of the stumbling blocks in the way of his achievement of full conviction, and in doing this he has so enriched his treasury of color that now his tonal utterance is one endles outpour of ravishing beauty.

The technical dexterity and dynamic pange which he had of old are still with him, of course, but he has lost all hardness of finger and wrist and has mellowed and deepened his original feeling for rhythmic line and melodic curve. He was always a searcher after symmetry of phrase and the light and shade of infinite varieties of finger accent and the elusive rubato; but of the floating, upborne breath of the vital legato he never was master till now. No planist living can evoke from his inatroment a more beautiful singing tone afternoon, and this cantilena was preserved throughout every work, in melodic utterance of every character, in solemn procession of chords, in filmy weavings of scales and trills and in all the more sointillant extoliations of fancy, which are too often treated as mere passage work.

Mr. Hofmann has gained very greatly also in understanding and affection, both for his instrument and for the music which he plays upon it. He treated the keyboard yesterday as if he loved it. But better than that, he played the piano as if his soul was in the art. He preached the lefty tenderness and fathomiess introspection of Beethoven in the great C minor sonata. opus 111, in a manner inspiring and touching. His master, Rubinstein, would have been proud of him indeed could be have heard this reverently conceived. carefully developed and exquisitely delivered reading.

Let those who will preach that Beethoven must be treated scholastically. The message of a reading such as Mr. Hofmann's carries with it its own beautiful satisfaction and gladdens every hearer for that the young artist does not belong to the school of pedagogic pianists who alone enjoy present authority in Germany. The professorial attitude, so notably held by Dr. Von Bulow, is eminently suited to cycles of sonatas heard by audiences armed with scores and note books. Mr. Hofmann's reading of the C minor sonata would perhaps impress such an audience ss an indecent exposure. This will be sufficient to inform habitual observers of musical doings that in the realm of emotional expression this young pianist has made large strides. It might be nearer the truth to say that his intense it has conceived the larger life that lies behind the phrase, the section, the move-

Mr. Hofmann's interpretation of the C major fantasia of Schumann was a far more convincing demonstration of this than his performance of the Beethoven sonata, chiefly for the reason that the range of dramatic thought in the composition is wider. In this work all of the pianist's now glorious palette of tone color, all of his diamond finish of enunciation, all of his epulent stores of sonority and his equally opulent resources of delicacy and daintiness were revealed in a manner that could have left no doubt in any mind that the audience was bearing one of the foremost living masters of the piano. Poetry, repose, tenderness, passion and power were all present in greater or less degree in this performance, and it was indeed good to

Mr. Hofmann in this recital tried the experiment of playing in succession all the preludes to Chopin, introducing the C sharp minor prelude, opus 45, in the series of 24 grouped as opus 28, at a suitable place. The presentation of these extraordinary moods in miniature," as Mr. Huneker so aptly called them, was most artistic and delightful. It was Schumann who spoke of them as "ruins, eagles' feathers, all strangely intermingled." But they caused that greatest of all music critics to exclaim: "He is the boldest, the proudest poet soul of his time. Hofmann played the preludes lovingly. Some of them he played so beautifully that only rhapsodic utterance could do him only rapposed uterance could be justice.

The other numbers on the list were the Eminor scherzo of Mendelssohn and three Liszt pieces, concluding with the "Campanella." After the Chopin series two encores were demanded and the pianist responded with two of the composer's studes. At the end of the recital there was the old familiar scene of an excited crowd of women—and some men—rushing down to the footlights and standing in rapt admiration while the artist played several additions to his prepared list. But it was a time for usual expressions of approval.

BRYAN THINKING IT OVER

NOT YET READY TO DECLARS HIMSELF AS A CANDIDATE,

Say National Committeemen Who Have Taiked With Him—His Own Financial Affairs One Factor—Nebedy's Business, He Says, If He Did Call on Hearst.

William J. Bryan returned to town yesterday from his up-State lecturing tour. He was at the Victoria Hotel and his call on William R. Hearst came in for a few words from him. He said: "It is no one's business whether or not I called on Mr. Hearst by appointment. The question of the Presidency was not discussed in any way during my call on Mr. Hearst."

Mr. Bryan continuing said:
"It is frequently reported that I am going to make an announcement at some time or place of my plans for the future. The fact is that I have never said to any one that I is that I have never said to any one that I would make an announcement at any time or place as to whether or not I would be a candidate for the Democratic nomination for President next year. That is one subject that I have refused to discuss. In reference to the published report that a brother-in-law of mine had said that I was a candidate for the nomination. I will say that I do not believe that my brother-in-law ever made any such statement.

Concerning the financial situation Mr. Bryan said:

"I do not believe that the present financial disturbance in New York city is really serious or likely to prove far reaching. It seems to me to be a case of unwarranted timidity One timid depositor in a bank will at the slightest alarm rush to withdraw his deposit. That will alarm others, and in that way a run on the bank begins.

Mr. Hearst's friends said yesterday that Mr. Hearst had a perfect political understanding with Mr. Bryan, a sort of offensive and defensive alliance, and this statement made by those in the confidence of Mr. Hearst, tallies with opinions expressed on different occasions of late by ex-President different occasions of late by ex-President Cleveland.

Mr. Bryan, it was learned yesterday, had recently told Democratic national committeemen that he was opposed to the nomination of Judge Gray of Delaware and that he would, oppose Judge Gray's followers in the convention next year. Mr. Bryan declared that his opposition to Judge Gray sprang from the latter's alleged antagonistic attitude in 1896 and 1900.

Mr. Bryan, according to Democratic Mr. Bryan, according to Democratic national committeemen yesterday, had not declared himself on the subject of his own candidacy for the reason that he is seriously debating his chances of victory One Democratic national committeeman put it this way: "Bryan loves money. He never had an assured income of moment until his nomination for the Presidency in 1896. This was made doubly sure by his second nomination in 1990. His lectures and writings on Democratic themes have made him a rich man. He is worth upward of $400,000. Then his income from the Commoner is large. A third defeat for Mr. Bryan would destroy his source of income, as the Democrats would not care to hear him lecture and they would not read his writings on Democracy and the circulation of the Commoner would dwindle. No matter what any one says Mr. Bryan will not announce himself as to his own position concerning a third Presidential nomination until he is satisfied of his chances."

MR. BRYAN TALKS TO WOMEN. Speaks on "The Individual and the State" at the Hudson Theatre

William Jennings Prvan spoke at the Hudson Theatre vesterday morning on The Individual and the State," to about 1,500 members and friends of the League for Political Education. Of that number perhaps 1.450 were women. At the conclusion of the speech one lone woman who said that she was a friend of Senator Harris of Tennessee, went on the stage and shook Mr. Bryan's hand. Mr. Bryan said that he knew Senator Harris as well as a young man might know an older one; and then he went to the City Club to lunch with

Mr. Eryan started of by saying that he was going to talk on a big subject not so large as the past, present and future of the universe, on which he once heard Private Allen speak still large. He realized that he was talking to an audience of the middle class. The reference did not seem to make a decided hit with the majority of those present, and Mr. Bryan proceeded to define "middle class." It appeared that persons of the middle class were those who were not so poor that it took all their time to make a living, and yet not so very rich that they were short of time to devote to the study of

The speaker declined to limit the amount of one man's fortune. He said that he had never felt that he could place a limit provided the fortune was gotten honestly and the honest way was to give something After luncheon with Mr. Ely Mr. Bryan left at 3 P. M. for Kingston.
